NY Times reports Google and Intel will team up with Sony to develop Google TV to bring the web into the living room through next gen TVs and set-top boxes.

Think social networks and other apps for smartphones that could be brought to television through the use of Android.

Based on Android, Google has allegedly built a prototype STB that runs on Intel's Atom, but the technology may be incorporated directly into TVs or other devices.

The three companies have already named Logitech to make peripheral devices, including a remote with a tiny keyboard.
